In addition, the psychological status of these boys will be studied, in terms of their feelings about genital lesions. It has been suggested that the psychological status of persons with a visible stigma is often affected. Twenty-four boys, aged 12-15 years, belonging to a low-income urban population in Durban, South Africa, were interviewed using a questionnaire which was designed and piloted for this study. The questionnaire contained 50 items to establish knowledge about genital lesions, self-concept, and attitudes towards the subject. The replies were subjected to quantitative analysis. Eighty-four percent of the boys knew that some of the common lesions are sexually transmitted. A strong pro-social stigma and strong negative attitudes towards people with genital lesions were found. Also, nearly half (47%) of the boys had a negative self-concept regarding their genital organs, 48% believed that people with genital lesions are less attractive and 48% believed that they should not make love (have sex) if they had genital lesions. The stronger the stigma towards this syndrome, the more likely they were to have a negative attitude towards people with genital lesions. Socioeconomic background and gender influenced the boys' attitudes about genital lesions. These findings suggest the need to reassess the policy of keeping boys uninformed about STDs, especially as this education could stigmatise them. Knowledge about genital lesions may need to be taught to all boys,
