Spasticity is the most common clinical manifestation of upper motor neuron disease; it commonly affects the upper limbs and is due to the hyperactivity of the stretch reflex. Treatment of spasticity is primarily palliative. However, as the etiologies and pathophysiology of spasticity are better understood, novel and more targeted therapeutic approaches are being developed. Botulinum toxin is currently the only FDA-approved treatment for the motor manifestations of spasticity; it blocks synaptic transmission at the neuromuscular junction of muscle spindle fibers and reduces spasticity as a result. Clostridium botulinum type A neurotoxin serotype A is most commonly used for the treatment of spasticity, but other serotypes are being investigated. Botulinum toxin blocks the release of acetylcholine at the motor endplate, and based on experimental data, it is thought to work primarily through a local mechanism. A recent controlled study of the effect of botulinum toxin type A injections in children and young adults with spasticity showed a decrease in electromyographic activity and pressure-pain sensitivity and an improvement in the functional status of the upper limbs.Unusual presentation of a seminoma with large mediastinal lymph node involvement. A case of testicular seminoma occurring in a 32-year-old man with marked mediastinal lymph node enlargement is presented.
