To determine if abnormalities of the cervical spine are more common in adult patients with hereditary spherocytosis than in healthy patients. To compare degenerative findings at the cervical spine of adult patients with hereditary spherocytosis, with patients with hemochromatosis, to determine if there are differences in the distribution of degenerative disease among the two groups. In addition, to compare the subjective clinical findings of the cervical spine in the two groups. The cervical spines of 121 consecutive adult patients with hereditary spherocytosis (91 with a definite diagnosis and 30 with borderline hemoglobin electrophoresis) were compared with 20 control patients without an hereditary spherocytosis. Blind, standardized lateral radiographs of the cervical spine of the two groups were evaluated for evidence of degenerative changes in the cervical spine. There was a significantly higher prevalence of degenerative changes at the cervical spine in patients with hereditary spherocytosis than in control patients (p LA-DR, GFP-CD11c) was measured on splenocytes at the peak of the response.
