Changes in ice cover in the Arctic have long been noted as a forerunner of climate change, and have stimulated the study of Arctic atmosphere aerosols. Aerosols and other particles exist in the atmosphere and their impact on the climate is uncertain. Some studies report the dust particles from the atmosphere get larger and drift down to the surface. Other aerosols, such as sea spray and the aerosols from the atmosphere, get smaller in size and become an integral part of the ice layer through diffusion. Sea ice in the Arctic is particularly critical to the environment, both in the Arctic and the Antarctic, since sea ice isolates one from another. Changes in the thickness of the ice has importance in the short term for living in an ice-covered area, since it determines one's level in the sea, and in the long term for the regional circulation of the atmosphere since the ice block affects the temperature of the bottom layer of the atmosphere. Existing techniques to monitor ice cover involve satellites, and aircraft equipped with radar or infrared (IR) sensors. However, these are not useful for tracking small spatial changes in thickness. None of the existing techniques can measure the layer immediately below the ice. This presents a problem, since much is known about the behavior of ice in the region, yet can contribute to the change in ice thickness only be ascertained by measuring the atmospheric aerosols and measuring below the ice layer.[Clinical results of first-line therapy in patients with chronic myelocytic leukemia (CML)]. We investigated the clinical characteristics of chronic myelocytic leukemia (CML) patients treated at our department and the first-line results of various therapies. Between 1984 and 1996, a total of 131 patients received first-line therapies. Among the patients, 112 were classified according to the French-American-British (FAB) classification, 4 according to the FAB-system plus additional characteristics. We analyzed the patients classified according to the FAB-system and found that the median age was 48, 9 years (range, 20 to 75 years), and 90 % of the patients were males. The median of white blood cells at diagnosis was 12,400/microliter, and 60 % of the patients had an increased W
