. Im looking for a player that can quickly rip and copy DVD5.Q: Are the changes to the AD Login screen potentially vulnerable to a CSRF attack? This is based on my findings, and I'd be very grateful if someone could clarify whether this is definitely accurate and, if so, then exactly what the vulnerability might be. I'm looking at the and specifically looking at the section about Security and Privacy on the AD Login screen. There is a setting "Don't show this page" and I see it can be set to "Never". What I'm struggling with is that if this is set to "Never", then does that mean that the AD Login screen is accepting requests from web applications? Is it vulnerable to CSRF attacks? What would happen if I edited the web application to send requests to a CSRF-style CSRF page/link? A: The potential issue of CSRF on the AD Login Page is exactly that: If you use sensitive information on the AD Login Page (eg: password, smtp credentials, etc.), the attacker can force you to use them using this link: In this case, you're not using sensitive information, but if you used it on that AD login page, you would be vulnerable to CSRF attacks. The login page by default is not protected, therefore it's not vulnerable by itself to CSRF. You should know that the MS documentation is correct. Q: Proof Explanation: How is this a proof of Fermat's Last Theorem? I am studying the proof of Fermat's Last Theorem from David Speyer's book called "A short proof of Fermat's Last Theorem". This is the proof in question. I am not very good at math but it seems that the proof is valid. I would like to know if the proof is really a proof of Fermat's Last Theorem or if it is correct?
