Generally, in print media, a photograph is cropped either top- or bottom- or both-side and then adjusted to bring out the features of the image. The photograph will also be cropped to remove the parts that need to be eliminated, such as the photographer's name, the time or date of the photograph, the type of lens used to shoot the image, and so forth. Cropping is more than just a creative shot; it's about design. While digital cameras offer several features, including automatic cropping, the range of options that a photographer can achieve after taking the photo is highly variable. This is also true with each type of photographic paper, film, or media. The bottom line is that when you're shooting with digital or film, you have less of a choice on how you're going to manipulate the photo. Cropping the image to remove the background Cropping the image is a technique to eliminate unwanted areas and create a design that works for your picture. Cropping is about framing and design. If you crop your photograph to eliminate unwanted areas, you're making a design choice that's different from the shot you took. Many people crop their images for a variety of reasons. For example, if the subject of the photograph is not facing directly toward the camera, you might crop the image to make it look less unnatural. If you crop the image for an artistic effect, try taking an extreme crop and then moving the crop point closer to the subject. You can crop to totally eliminate or focus on only a part of the subject. If you see your subject in the foreground of the image and want to eliminate the background, you could crop the image to the extent that only the subject remains. If you want to emphasize the person, or in this case, the subject's eyes, try a close crop of only a person's eyes. You can crop the image up to or over the subject's face to make it a more interesting portrait. Cropping is a very personalized way of adjusting a photograph, so don't cut corners if you crop or crop off too much. Ira G. Reid from the Mensa Report wrote a fascinating article on the topic of cropping. Cropping the image is a technique that you can apply to any type of photograph. It is a form of the "straighten and crop" technique. Instead of straightening your image to make it look less distorted, you're going to crop it to remove areas that are not in the best

Every photographer has a thousand ideas they wish they could get out of their camera and onto a computer screen. The first thing you need to do to get those images out of your camera is to learn how to maximize the quality of your photos. Before you start editing photos, you have to know your way around the tools. You have to learn how to capture better images and manage the images you already have. You have to know how to choose the right camera settings for the settings you want to use, and you have to know how to apply these settings. If you don't have an idea of the best settings for a photo you're about to take, if you don't understand how the camera really works, and if you don't know how to use the controls to adjust the picture's exposure, highlight, contrast, colors, perspective and other elements, the photo will never turn out how you want it to. This tutorial is about getting the most out of your camera. I'll show you how to correct the shadows, exposure, white balance, highlights and shadows, exposure, saturation, contrast, colors, apply filters and add special effects. I'll even introduce you to some of the best Photoshop Elements tools for photo editing. This tutorial is for people who know how to use a camera or get a DSLR. I show you how to take control of your camera settings, how to adjust and edit images in Photoshop Elements 10, and how to print and 05a79cecff

What's New In?

Two years ago on this blog, I wrote an extensive post about the relationship between business and politics. Over the past year, I have been invited to speak at conferences and events about this issue, and about how political and partisan debates in Australia are really about finding the best way to solve problems. After presenting at various national, state and private conferences, I have gradually begun to realise that policy is really about choosing among some very stark but distinct ways of moving ahead. For this reason, I have been quite excited to have an invitation to present at the upcoming Consumer Action Forum in Brisbane, and to have the opportunity to be part of a discussion that is really looking at how we can maintain competitiveness in the face of increasingly disruptive technologies, as well as how to take advantage of these technologies to create a more inclusive society. If you are interested in taking part in this conference, which is being organised by the Sydney Institute, you can register here, and it will take place on October 17th at the Prince Charles Cinema, Brisbane. A starting point for our discussion today is that current policy in Australia is focused on promoting opportunities for the status quo. This has been true for decades, with neither the major parties acknowledging the importance of genuine digital inclusion, nor the major parties doing much to re-envision government as a digital agency. But there are now serious proposals to change this situation. At the 11th instalment of the Federal Parliament's digital policy agenda, the Senate has proposed adding digital inclusion to the list of priorities for digital policy. So, it might be that in the coming years we see a more coherent policy framework, and one that aims for digital inclusion as a priority. However, we are now in a situation where major parties are seeking to craft the terms of this debate. In the next few months, I will be encouraging Senators to resist political pressure, and to adopt a "bottom up" approach to policymaking. In the medium term, I will be working with like-minded people to develop the concept of a digital agency. However, if we do not act now to engage with policymaking in a spirit of honest compromise, we will be stuck with the same politics and policymaking that we have had so far in Australia. Seen from the outside, Australia's policymaking looks rational, and there is nothing inherently wrong with that. But when seen from inside, it is clear that this policy is being shaped by special
