Q: Parsing with XDocument using an XML File in a Model I am writing an XDocument that will contain a log file of type "traffic" that will contain XML data with tags/properties to be associated. There are several log files, and they will be matching tags at every line, so I have to use the same XDocument for all of them, and change it's properties. I have defined my XDocument like this:
[XmlRoot("traffic", Namespace = "urn:test")] public class TrafficFile : XNode { public PropertyRules propRules { get; set; } public PropertyControl proControl { get; set; } public PropertyRules controlRules { get; set; } } PropertyRules contain tags containing string properties: public class PropertyRules : XNode { public string test { get; set; } public string yes { get; set; } public string no { get; set; } public string ssid { get; set; } } PropertyControl contain tags containing integer properties: public class PropertyControl : XNode { public int k { get; set; } public int m { get; set; } public int h { get; set; } } The XML structure is going to contain a set of traffic logs, that will be continuable, if we add more traffic logs, the description of the first log (macro) might remain the Tag Archive: Erik Spoelstra A little over a week into my first college basketball season and I'm already sick of basketball. Last night, I watched a spectacular loss and a very disappointing win. I started out the year with a couple of great teams that overachieved and an average team that underachieved. Then I hit the midpoint of the season and was left with four teams who have been mediocre at best. The once great Duke team is now out of the race and the only teams that have a real shot at the top four are Wichita State and Butler. Last night, after watching the Bulldogs and Shockers handily defeat Miami, I found myself praying that Duke would be the team I will despise before the end of the season. My prayers were answered. I realize that if Duke and

Kansas both finish the year in the top four they will have an exceedingly hard time getting to the Final Four, but it is highly unlikely that Duke will be one of those teams. While watching Duke lose to the very mild teams at the bottom of the league, my mind tried to wander to the pros, wondering if the 2013 playoffs will be like the 2009 NBA Finals. Will LeBron and the Heat finally lose a title? Will Boston crash hard against the Pacers and finish the year with the number two seed and a second round matchup against Miami? Will Andrew Bynum be the most dominant force since Larry Legend? The answers to all those questions were no. I'm not going to get into a full season-by-season preview, but let's take a quick look at the eastern conference. The Heat will only have one of the Big Three back this year. It's the year 1851, and the days of wood-paneled frontier saloons and wild west gunfights are coming to an end. The Old West has given way to the Dark Ages, and the few settlers left are faced with the grim reality of an ancient, long forgotten curse. Deep in the mountains of western North America lies an ancient Native American civilization that weathered the storm of European colonization to prevail in a magnificent power and a terrible secret. The descendants of this civilization are now spreading the word that anyone who enters their territory, especially those who wear the uniform of the U.S. government, will be consumed by fire. They are known as the Therians, and some say they are the curse, the vile harbingers of the end of mankind. Therians are a hidden presence in the land, lurking in the shadows, lying in wait for innocent people to wander into their territory. And when they do, the Therians will consume them. Players can choose from a wide variety of character archetypes and build a character that best fits their play style. As the story unfolds, players will come to know the various Therians, encounter hidden and dangerous things, and fight enemies in a dark, terrifying world. The game features a dark, atmospheric visual style, a tense mood, and plenty of secrets to discover. Gameplay Features Delve into a unique, post-apocalyptic style adventure in a world that has been long forgotten. Build your character as you see fit, and collect the gear that best suits you. ### What's new:

Puzzle Poppers was an anthology game show produced by Paul A. Sammon and hosted by Bart Conner, that aired on the American Broadcasting Company from 1985-1987. Game format Each show consisted of six puzzles, played in pairs. Two of the players in each set finished first, with the other two going into the third round. Two puzzles were performed by the best performers, and the others were simple tasks that did not require athletes (such as strapping books down, stacking blocks, closing valves, and telephoning numbers). First round A mystery box, filled with prizes for the first level was opened to select two of the players in each group, those six selected players advanced to the second round. The second round was played as a series of rounds with three contestants, each of which had to solve a themed puzzle (for example, one as a water puzzle, one as a cave, etc.). At the end of each round, the player who solved the puzzle received a point. Whoever accumulated the most points won the prize(s) and one of the mystery boxes, and advanced to the finals. Second round In the second round, there were two mystery boxes opening. The box chosen by each player was found to be filled with goodies for the person who remained in the game: one held another mystery box, the other held a letter. The first player to think of the letter he or she saw in the box and correctly name the mystery box was scored a point and the envelope he or she opened was sent to a participating prize-winning "game show" home. If a correct guess was made by the last contestant in the game, he or she, along with the envelope the other player opened, would be sent to a participating prize-winning "game show" home. Finals The two mystery boxes open were worth $1,000 in series one and then $5,000 in series two. If a player correctly guessed the letter, he or she was allowed a minute to try to open the box. If the box was opened and the letter correctly figured out, then the prize was won and the contents were given to the player. If the box was not opened in that minute, the player could forfeit the prize and the prize would be given to the next player to guess the answer correctly. History The series launched on October 5, 1985 and aired Saturday afternoons. Two editions aired, with the final hosted in July
