What makes the LG GD75 a must have phone?

Asymmetrical design mirrors the heavy handedness of this phone. The black/white design is only broken up by a USB port on the left side, while on the right side is a green color-accented power button. Instead of the traditional camera/widgets/menu setup on the LG GD75, you'll find the typical smartphone main menu along with the aforementioned power button. The LG GD75 runs Android 4.0 Ice Cream Sandwich, which makes it an instant upgrade from the previous LG GD55. This means the LG GD75 is a fast phone, but also more prone to crashing than the GD55. Some of you may be wondering where the ergonomics have gone. Instead of a slide-out mechanism for the camera, the LG GD75 has swapped it out for a physical button. While this doesn't give you the same control it does allow a much smaller part of your hand to be used. The LG GD75 also has a standard VGA camera, rather than a higher resolution camera. Two things I like about the ergonomics on the LG GD75 are the way they separated the volume rocker from the power button, and the screen's clickiness. The rocker looks crisp and doesn't have the slight mushy feeling you get on some smartphones, the power button, however, has the distinct feel of a button when you click on it. The phone has
