How do I get the name of the last column of a pandas data frame? I.e. I would like to do the following in the most generic way: return df.columns[???] Is there something like tail(df, n=None) which returns the last n columns? A: We can use subset with head : df.columns[-1] or another similar option is last df.iloc[-1] Q: How do we get the source directory for a specific project? We are using CruiseControl.NET to build solutions. We have several projects in different locations. We have a special project template for this scenario. The problem we have is when we want to create a new project we see a C# project, what we are expecting is a Visual C# project. Currently we have a pretty simple custom target like this: However, this is setting the whole ${projectDirectory} that includes the source directories. So the question is how do we just get the project directory without the source directories? A: use ${project.name} Use the ${project.name} property to get a specific project 0cc13bf012

Enjoy Sobolev-Poincaré type inequalities and dependence on matrix valued weights. We prove that, for any compact metric space X, the space B₀(X) of bounded functions of Holder continuous modulus of continuity type with values in the space Lip(X) (the space of matrix valued Lipschitz functions) is quasi-reflexive. We also prove an interesting relation between the quasi-reflexivity of B₀(X) and the dependence of B₀(X) on the weight functions in the so-called Sobolev-Poincaré inequalities. These inequalities play an important role in the theory of potentials in nonlinear analysis. It is shown that, for any n x n symmetric matrix A = (a_{ij}), A in B₀(R_n) if and only if the following inequalities hold: |1|₁ + |1|_{j1} + |i1j1|2 Aij2 0 (notice that if |1| = |i1| = |j1| = 1 then c = 1).in's role as a novel mechanism of inhibiting proliferation in the transformed mammary epithel
