In the developed world, a person’s funeral is relatively uncontroversial: a short ceremony, where friends and family gather, friends say something, there is a tolling of the church bells, and the body is interred or cremated (or perhaps the ashes are scattered in some tropical setting). Australia is more unusual. Many Australians live in a community not their own. The relative ease of moving from region to region, and the wide availability of cremation, means that most people are in a position to have little or no mourning. The last time I spoke to my father, he told me: “Mum and I are thinking of moving down to Tasmania.” “Yeah, it’s been on the cards for a while,” I said. “That would be great.” Later, I will meet my step-grandmother. When I do, I intend to ask her about the fact that her partner lives in a community 15 minutes away from where I have now settled. “Do you have your own place, or is he in the community with you?” “Oh, we live together,” she says. “Okay,” I say. “We haven’t really talked about it before,” she says. “It’s a bit scary, I think.” She looks at me across the sea of cheese and wine. “There’s a reason we didn’t think about moving together to Tasmania,” she says. “My husband will be 60 when I’m dead.” My heart skips a beat, or
