“This is the first iteration of HyperMotion Technology, and we’ve made significant progress since the first iteration of Player Impact Engine,” said Matt Prior, FIFA Technical Director. “The challenges were how to use a high-speed camera to create a high-quality game experience for players to interact with and the data analysis process needed to extract the data to drive the game. With the vast amount of data collected from real players we need to be able to mine it for the game specific rules, physics, gameplay and behaviors.” “Using high-speed cameras, we collect motion capture data while players are actually playing live on the pitch,” said Brian Brown, Chief Technology Officer at PIVOT Sports. “With this data, we use a custom algorithm, the FIFA 21 Player Impact Engine, to model the real-life player movements, the physical attributes of the player and their movements.” The improved physics engine represents “game-style” physics that better represent all of the relevant actions, including player-versus-player contact and ball rolling, while providing a precise recreation of the real-life movement, on-ball actions, and the increased player speed and predictability in plays. And to ensure even more accuracy, match conditions, such as weather, wind, snow, and lighting were also taken into account in the development of the physics system. “We have to be very careful that the rules of the game are kept in check,” said Geoff Freeman, Senior Producer at EA Sports. “That meant that some aspects of the game had to be simplified. Due to the lack of space in the physical simulation, we had to limit the number of sub-physics such as physics of the ball, collisions of players with each other and, when possible, the ball. While enabling the new engine, FIFA 21 improves the physics engine in other ways to improve the feeling of player movement and all of the physical actions like the new elasticity of player collision and physical characteristics of players that give a higher degree of realism. The significant advances of the Player Impact Engine, in part due to the availability of real-life training data and analytics, help us model more accurately real-life play, ball-interaction and the reactions and movements of players. With the use of this data, the engine is used in four different ways. For Player Behavior and Player Personalities

Features Key:

- Progression for Players and Clubs Sports Interactive engineers have fully embraced the new player progression system. Not only are new players now able to personalise their character through in-game training, but you’ll see enhanced gameplay effects depending on your performance! Every tackle, each interception, every intentional foul and every successful tackle come alive in the game when you make big saves.
- FIFA 22 focuses on excitement through control and game pacing. According to Digital Trends, “The more game feels like a sim game, the more people buy the game.” This new control scheme, with a better feeling of boot down and touch passes and more responsiveness, will help your players feel the pressure. Fans can also be able to build a virtual-reality stadium and follow their team in their surroundings. Whether it’s watching big games, checking out scores of local games or cheering on your team, nothing is more exciting than being able to control your team from any angle at any time.
- FIFA 22 introduces “HyperMotion Technology,” which uses motion capture data collected from a number of real-life players that have been in motion capture suits participating in a full, high-intensity football match, including a celebration at full tilt, to power FIFA gameplay. This includes Player AI, which has been enhanced to react and respond like a real player, accurate player models that can move and breathe in more realistic ways, and the introduction of four player 2-on-2 matches.
- Dynamic Tactics - Use Tactical Defending to make sure your team does what it needs to do! Defending is more interactive than ever, as you can press the “Defend” button to dynamically emulate switching your coverage, controlling it by hand, or calling a second defender to push forward and help out. Even if you don’t have an X or square button to tap, you can now press buttons to change positions and switch your defenders automatically, while Dictating your Passing, Tackling, Interceptions, and GK Mapping will ensure that you can make the pass, tackle, or intercept with the intensity and players you want.
- Improved Grass System - All players’ movements feel more realistic when they track grass, with players feeling as though they’re floating in the air when they’re on the pitch. You won’t want to be anywhere but on the pitch with players that
