Every year, the United States spends more than $1 trillion in health care. While this is a step in the right direction, the United States still spends the most per capita for health care in the world. Part of the reason why the United States spends so much money on health care is because it has a lot of uninsured people. Of course, if everyone could afford health care, then this number would be a whole lot lower, and health care would be a whole lot cheaper. Since most people who get their health insurance through their employers usually get relatively cheap insurance, this makes it very easy to afford health care. But as a way to make health care more affordable for everyone, the majority of Americans instead rely on the individual insurance market. Some people like to think of the individual insurance market as a free market. They claim that if there is no government regulation, then everyone will voluntarily keep costs down in order to compete. But what many of those same people don't realize is that the private insurance market is a highly regulated market. Because of the regulations, insurance companies are not allowed to charge pre-existing conditions, cover children until they are 26 years old, provide pregnant women with prenatal care, and the like. This makes it very hard for an individual insurance provider to charge more for health care than any other company, unless there is actual legislation that requires them to do so. For example, if you had a life insurance policy with a $15,000 premium, but a company gave you free health care for the next decade, would you willingly increase your premium to $30,000? Probably not, right? So if the insurance companies are forced to compete fairly, then the prices of health insurance can go down. But if you give the insurance companies free money, then competition will not be much of an issue. Of course, there is a way to ensure that insurance companies don
