Maturation of smooth muscle myosin heavy chain kinetics in the monkey basilar artery. The present study examined the process of maturation of smooth muscle myosin heavy chain (SM-MyHC) kinetics in the monkey basilar artery using an assay that coupled light-scattering to measuring myosin exchange kinetics. In cells isolated from the basilar artery of fetal, juvenile and young adult monkeys, at maximum Ca(2+) activation myosin exchange was observed at a single velocity of movement, whereas in adult monkeys two distinct velocities of exchange were seen. The percent of the myosin population with two exchanges was consistent with the percent of SM-MyHC immunoblotting present in young adult arteries compared with older adult arteries. These results demonstrate that development of the process of myosin exchange in the basilar artery involves changes in the kinetic behavior of the two populations of myosin and the expression of two distinct isomyosins in the developing monkey.
Abstract This paper presents a new calibration methodology for 3D camera pose estimation using a single camera by combining multi-view geometry and machine learning. Specifically, a series of low-complexity 2D/3D joint matches are established for a given 3D target surface, and a rotation matrix is computed that projects 3D points from the target surface onto the 2D images. Then, the 3D camera pose is estimated from the 2D/3D joint matching by optimally rotating the camera pose in the image plane to minimize the error between the 2D/3D matching results and the 3D image points. The proposed method makes use of a more complete search in the 3D space than the 2D/3D joint matching alone, resulting in better performance, and it makes c9d1549cdd
