However, when the Spark job runs, the data is not persisted in HBase. I followed the Spark docs on using LOAD CSV with a transactional writer and it seems to require me to wrap all of the HBase writes in a transactional block. I have two questions: 1) Is the LOAD CSV FROM DATA operation transactional? 2) Is the LOAD CSV FROM DATA operation transactional in a Spark job with a block-based writer? A: For your question #1, LOAD CSV is basically streaming the CSV file by batch. At a certain point, the file has been processed, and the result of the processing is saved to a permanent storage. For question #2, I assume that a Spark job writes data back to HBase. At that point, HBase has already processed that data. That would mean that data is already saved into database, as opposed to new data that you load with LOAD CSV. That would explain why HBase cannot process that data. When I talk about trackpads in PC Perspective, I'm talking about the normal "clicking" or "clicky" feel that many laptops use when you first encounter it. When you start using your trackpad the first thing you notice is how "clicky" it is. If you've used this style of trackpad for a while, you begin to not notice the "
