A Death Threat Against F-16 Stealth Fighter Pilots Arrived Via E-Mail A warning that the pilots of an F-16 fighter squadron were being targeted for death arrived in an e-mail Saturday. Pilots at Nellis AFB were told their identities had been uploaded onto a popular Web site, www.deathstation.com, as part of an elaborate plot to kill them, said two officials briefed on the information. The airmen were threatened to death by a member of a group that was trying to kill a U.S. president or vice president, both of whom the e-mail suggests are targeted for assassination, one official said. The base's command center was alerted to the threat at about 9:55 p.m. Saturday and immediately notified base authorities, who notified the Department of Justice, the Nevada FBI office and other federal agencies. All are investigating the matter, which one official said appeared genuine. The base commander, Col. Steve Fry, said he believed the threat was an effort by a group to both alert the public about a possible assassination plot and in some way embarrass the Air Force. "I don't believe it's a really serious threat," said Fry, adding that he was confident that the pilots would not be harmed. "They should be safe, but it's a concern." Fry said the threat was anonymous and did not clearly indicate which president or vice president was under threat. "It's my opinion that it's an attempt to hamper Air Force operations," Fry said. "I think it comes from the [conservative] side of the political spectrum." Michael Harp, a spokeswoman for the Department of Defense, said the threat was sent through its message system called E-mail Exploit. But she declined to elaborate.

Q: What is the math behind lightsaber strength and how much it impacts combat effectiveness? Hm, the earliest episode of the Clone Wars talked about lightsaber strengths. It said that a lightsaber with over twenty times the power of a typical lightsaber would cause severe damage to the user. While watching various many-blade fighting techniques from various moons and locales over the last few years, I realized that there is a correlation between the amount of blades and actual in-blade strength. My question: Are there any known methods for increasing in-blade strength? How much does increased blade strength actually help a user in battle? Should I train in x-blade combat techniques or should I only focus on lightsaber combat skills? A: First of all, the Math behind Light Saber strength. Lightsaber power is driven by the flyback of the current's curvature as it passes through the inner rectricle. As the current moves through the circular shaped Core, the flow of current creates a magnetic field that allows the current to pass through its full curvature. This in turn creates high electromagnetic voltages that when combined with high level of current is called, "light saber power
