It was at the time of the marriage a community property of the parties, and the legal title to the community property was vested in William G. Lindsay and Martha E. Lindsay, husband and wife. On or about May 16, 1940, the appellee and Thurman, the appellant, as sole heirs of William G. Lindsay, deceased, executed and delivered to Lindsey & Company, a corporation, a bill of sale for certain real estate. From the testimony of Thurman, the appellant, it appears that the appellant, Thurman, was a remote and unknown heir of her father and that her name was changed to Martha E. Lindsay, in her twenty-third year, in order to prevent any infringement on the community property. The appellant told the appellee that she was going to give him a bill of sale on May 16, 1940, for certain property. On that same day, the appellant delivered to Lindsey & Company a deed which conveyed, among other things, the real estate involved in this suit. On that same day, the appellant was married to the appellee and, at the same time, the appellant assigned to the appellee her interest in certain mining claims, and, in consideration of that assignment, the appellee paid to the appellant $7,500.00. 26 In the divorce action, the appellant took the position that she and her husband had been bona fide purchasers for value of the property. The trial court found the facts against the appellant. It had been stipulated that the

A city of mystery, death, and devastation built by the ancient, foreboding, mysterious, and dangerous Vasco. But now, when the city is under attack, the Strange Supernaturals are the only hope. Quantification of turbulent dissipation in a skewed and non-uniform flow. The paper presents a study on the turbulent dissipation rate from a numerical computed tomography experiment. Measurements were taken at different vertical locations of an inclined, non-uniform turbulent flow located in the outer region of the wake of an inclined cylinder with multiple bluff bodies. This type of flow configuration is typical for a supersonic, large jet engine in non-streamline and oblique-angle trajectories. The flow was blocked by three just upstream of the beam. The mean velocity was half of the free-stream velocity and it had local streamwise and spanwise variations. The measurement location had a skewed spanwise location with respect to the mean streamwise mean velocity gradient and the mean inplane velocity gradient, with regard to the mean inplane velocity component. After averaging results from eighteen measurements, the turbulent dissipation rate based on two-point Kolmogorov similarity theory was estimated for a wide range of turbulent intensities, from 3 to 30 kW m(-2). For further analysis and comparison, non-uniform flow was modelled numerically. The numerical results are in good agreement with the experimental results for moderate turbulence intensities. The effects of skewed mean flow conditions on the turbulent dissipation are thoroughly investigated. It is found that the skewed spanwise velocity leads to a lower intensity at the measurement location, than that expected from a flow with uniform flow conditions. As a consequence of the negatively skewed mean flow, the
