But the saga of the Crown Street man's sacking from his school job grew and grew - ultimately causing months of misery. And now, after a legal crackdown by the ACT Civil and Administrative Tribunal, it appears his sacking and subsequent efforts to win back his job may be over. The tribunal found Mr Roberts acted lawfully in standing by his right to freedom of political communication - and that the school breached its employment contract with him. It also ruled the school and ACT Education Department had failed to show evidence to overturn the tribunal's finding the school had not shown it had a legitimate reason for sacking him. The news came on Tuesday, just two days after Mr Roberts was spotted by The Canberra Times at his old school. The ACT Civil and Administrative Tribunal yesterday ruled in Mr Roberts' favour and awarded him $14,832.97 in compensation. It was the first time the tribunal had ruled in favour of a public servant in a case brought under the Public Sector Employment Act 1991. The tribunal was unable to comment yesterday due to "redundant personnel". The tribunal has set aside its finding and Mr Roberts' decision is pending. But until it is overturned, the decision was made in his favour. "It's not going to change anything, but it does mean that I'm going to be able to go back to my school teaching," Mr Roberts said. "I'm very happy about it." Mr Roberts was sacked in February after a series of rows with former principal, Dr Kenan Neill. He was later reinstated by the ACT Civil and Administrative Tribunal after the school appealed the decision. "The school argued that I had caused a major
