The kinetics of chromosome damage in MRC-5 cells exposed to 0.5-1.0 microM carboplatin (CBDCA) for 1, 2 and 4 hr were studied by the Trypsin-Giemsa banding (GTB) technique. The dose used was on the basis of the clinical blood level of CBDCA with resultant 5 mM concentration in the medium. Two types of chromosomal aberrations were analyzed: (1) the frequency of cells with a range of fragmentation involving one or more arms was very low; (2) the frequency of aneuploid cells was already significant after 2 hr. A dose-response relationship was found for both types of aberrations. The dose-response curve was obtained for both types of aberrations. The estimated half-maximal effective concentration (EC50) value was 0.71 microM. It was found that CBDCA did not induce formation of reactive oxygen species (ROS). On the basis of published data, it is concluded that the chromosome damage induced by CBDCA is probably a result of a direct effect on DNA. The results of this study allow the kinetic evaluation of potential damage which might be induced by clinical CBDCA treatment. The effect of insular epilepsy on the growth of children with minimal brain dysfunction. The aim of this study was to investigate
