New Zealand There were 1,858,000 people living in New Zealand at the 2016 census, making up the 14th. largest population of any country in the world. New Zealand's landscape is both unique and diverse. It is the most mountainous country in the world, with a series of ranges running the length of the country from north to south. The mountains run through many biomes including tundra, rainforest, grassland, and coastal regions. The country also has coasts and a wide range of climates from temperate to arid. New Zealand has the highest level of human development relative to its size of any country in the world. This was highlighted in the 2011 UNDP Human Development Report, which cited New Zealand's level of human development was the fourth highest of all countries. Population Although the population has been growing rapidly over the past twenty years, it is currently stable. The population of New Zealand has changed dramatically since its first inhabitants, the Polynesian Maori, and European settlers arrived. Current population estimates are around five million, but it is becoming increasingly likely that the country will top the six million mark by around 2060. Dwellings At the 2011 census, 55% of households had a natural gas connection, and 43% had a gas stove. These numbers have changed significantly in the past two decades. At the 2011 census, 57% of households had electricity, and 36% had television, both rates are among the highest in the world. The New Zealand housing stock was rated the best in the world in 2011, and is projected to stay among the top ten in the world for the next three decades. New Zealand has a very high level of interconnection between homes, workplaces and public transport. If you need to leave home to go to work, most of the time you will not need a car. It is the most highly urbanized and the least isolated country in the world, with the majority
