The contact point is normally formed in the dashboard of the vehicle and requires a wire to reach the contact point. These contact points are not aesthetically appealing and are not convenient for the driver as well as the vehicle occupants. Electric vehicle charging stations are currently in production, e.g., in the form of parking spaces with (fixed) charging connections of a building or a network. Similar wireless charging stations are also currently in production in home, hotel and office environments (as on-demand charging station "infrastructure"). However, they are not applicable for vehicular (in-vehicle) charging of a motor vehicle. For providing the electric power, conventional electric vehicle charging stations or on-demand charging station "infrastructure" require that the motor vehicle with the energy source, e.g., a plug, is stationary at the charging station. This is achieved via the use of stationary energy sources, e.g., a battery, that is fixed to the charging station and to which the electric motor vehicle is
