Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to a cap assembly for closing the open top of a beverage container. More particularly, the present invention relates to a cap assembly for use with an open top beverage container, wherein the cap may be rotated and moved between a first position and a second position. 2. Related Art Fluid containers often include a cap to close the opening at the top of the container. The cap may be screwed or snap-fit onto the container opening or it may be snap-fit directly onto the container. Often, the container is so arranged that it may be held in an open position. As a result, a spill may occur if the user is not carefully monitoring the quantity of liquid and the position of the container. In this respect, if the container is open, the liquid which has spilled from the container may flow onto the ground or nearby furniture. As a result, the liquid may soil the floor or the furniture as well as the user. One popular type of beverage container is known as an open top container. An open top container includes a container body having an open top and a cap for closing the open top. In the past, open top containers were arranged in a container rack in a specific orientation. More recently, they have been provided in a re-usable, stackable format so that they may be collected after use and refilled. In either case, the open top containers include a lid, or cap, to close the open top. Unfortunately, the open top containers of the prior art require one or more long projections extending upwardly from the open top container in order to insert the cap into the lid or closure for closing the open top container. As a result, when the open top container is stored with the lid partially inserted into the open top container, the projections extending from the open

Most cytogenetic laboratories use synthetic polymers as substrates for cell culture. Although well-suited for routine micronucleus studies, they are not appropriate for some assay systems such as studies of metaphase versus anaphase chromosome loss in tumor cells, chromosome loss in healthy human cells induced by gamma radiation or inhibitors of DNA synthesis, mitotic recombination, sister chromatid exchange, loss of repair function, or chromosome breakage in long-term cell cultures. Microscopes equipped with fluorescence lenses allow cells to be stained with fluorescent DNA probes and observed without any interruption in cell growth. These solutions have been shown to be useful for many cytogenetic experiments. However, most of these fluorescence-labeled DNA probes are purified and preserved for use in the laboratory. Such products are not suitable for routine use in a manufacturing, clinical or field setting where a reliable method of storage is essential. A reliable storage method has not been established for most fluorescent DNA probes. Thus, prior to their use in staining cells, these fluorescent DNA probes are usually stored in tubes which are inappropriate for shipping, flow storage or long-term storage. As a result, technicians in the cytogenetic laboratory often use commercial DNAs for quality control, functional analysis, or as a replacement for DNA that has been stored at -70°C. Unfortunately, such DNAs have several disadvantages: 4 They must be freshly prepared and stored under rigorously controlled conditions prior to use. 5 The shelf life is only 2 to 4 years. Steryl hydrolysis of the DNA prevents further use of the DNA Ribonuclease degrades the DNA into various fragments that may interfere with the staining reaction. 6 Although the purity of the DNA is usually high, it contains contaminating proteins.
