Time Factors May Hinder Healing From Open Wounds The sooner a wound is closed, the better is the chance of its whole healing properly, according to a study led by researchers from Trinity College Dublin and King’s College London. When an open wound is allowed to heal, its own fibroblasts carry out the softening of the tissue and this process, called “healing by remodelling,” is essential for successful healing. “Remodeling is well established to occur in a chronic wound, but our study shows that the healing process may be delayed in an acute wound,” says Dr. Eddie Nolan, of the University of Southampton, who heads the study. To assess the potential of fibroblasts to repair an open wound, the researchers took skin biopsies from ten people who had suffered the injuries, and compared the abundance of these cells’ nuclei. www.facebook.com/txbforg/ A loss of higher-order glomerular structure is associated with proteinuria in experimental diabetes mellitus. The effects of experimental diabetes on the structure and composition of glomeruli from the renal cortex were evaluated to determine whether alterations in glomerular structure precede or are a consequence of proteinuria. Streptozotocin-induced diabetic rats were followed for 4 weeks. Protein excretion was measured by calculation of the ratio of daily urinary nitrogen to body weight as a marker of glomerular permeability. Glomeruli were prepared by collagenase digestion for morphological analysis or were analysed for urinary albumin by radioimmunoassay and for the cytoskeletal proteins F-actin, vinculin and ZO-1 by immunocytochemistry. Four weeks of uncontrolled hyperglycaemia resulted in a marked increase in the rate of excretion of nitrogen from the urinary bladder (58.5 +/- 4.8 vs 18.2 +/- 1.1 mg N/100 g BW) and a reduction in glomerular volume (89.3 +/- 6.1% of control, P
